

My notes on this whole process:

From what I understood in the process, everything starts when the model goes live or posts content and fans begin entering the chat. The first thing that should happen is welcoming the fan properly by replying naturally like asking a specific question that has happened during the stream, use voice notes when possible, and trying to make the conversation feel personal instead of immediately trying to sell something. After that, the chatter needs to identify what kind of fan they are talking to because not every fan should be approached the same way. Some fans are aggressive and immediately ask for content or sexual conversations, while others are more into the GFE type of interaction where they want emotional connection, attention, and casual conversations first before anything else. Once the fan type is identified, the conversation flow changes depending on their behavior and interest. The next important part is validation, where the chatter makes the fan feel attractive, wanted, interesting, or appreciated through compliments, reactions, and emotional responses because this helps build comfort and attachment. However, the framing step is the one that is usually forgotten even though I'm pretty sure it is one of the most important parts of the whole process. Framing is what makes the fan feel like they are the reason behind the excitement, attraction, teasing, or sexual energy happening in the conversation, and because of that, they become more emotionally invested and more willing to continue engaging or spending. After building enough emotional connection and momentum, the first PPV is introduced naturally with short teasing captions connected to the ongoing conversation. The chatter should still continue talking between PPVs instead of disappearing after sending content because maintaining the emotional flow is important. As the interaction continues, the conversation slowly escalates through teasing, flirting, validation, voice notes, and personalized responses while additional PPVs are sent gradually. Later on, the fan may also be encouraged to participate more through pictures, reactions, or voice notes to deepen engagement. Once the interaction reaches the final stage, aftercare becomes important because the chatter should thank the fan, compliment them, and make them feel appreciated so the entire experience feels personal rather than transactional. Finally, notes are usually kept about the fan's interests, personality, hobbies, and preferences so future conversations can feel more natural, personalized, and emotionally connected, which helps create long-term loyalty and repeat spending.